The Human Relations program focuses on the distinct, yet overlapping, contributions that scholars in the field of anthropology, psychology and sociology have made toward an understanding of human behavior. The interdisciplinary approach provides students with a greater array of theories and methods for studying and analyzing human behavior than is possible through the pursuit of a single-discipline major.

Human relations majors at Pitt-Bradford take courses in Social Psychology, Field Research, Statistics, Socialization and Social Research. Students have the opportunity to go beyond the classroom by getting some real-world experience through internships at many organizations, including senior citizen centers, youth homes, hospitals or local corporations. Human relations majors can receive academic credit for study abroad in Latin America, Japan, Europe and Africa.
